Editing this book has been a challenging but affirming experience for me. Challenging because I found myself having to further reduce a shortlist that was the result of quite rigorous reviews. I am thankful for the significant contributions made by highly respected scholars in Nigeria and abroad. Their work made mine much easier than it would have been.

In popular thought, digital media are seen as remarkable because of the ways in which they have been evolving and affecting our lives over the last four decades. In engaging with the contributions to this book, however, I am struck by the problematic story of humans attempting creative responses to the compelling power of digital media. I acknowledge the insight and passion of the contributors who are telling this story.

I am thankful for my colleagues in the Association of Communication Scholars & Professionals of Nigeria and my students (and teachers) at the universities of Lagos and Jos. They include me in serious conversations, thus 'aiding and abetting' my fascination with learning, and inclination to learn by imagining the 'things' that affirm us.

Finally, I am truly grateful to my wife and daughter who endured my 'scientific' conversation or, worse, my inattentive presence at home when the things that affirm us took over.
